OCA15.1 - Annotation of the output with contextual information concerning the description of creative process and the content of the research/artistic/other activity, etc.

The author aims to point out with research evidence and period sources from Antiquity that the apostle Paul in his theology stood as close to Judaism as to Hellenism.

OCA16.1 - Annotation of the output in English

The results of the research in the field of understanding the apostle Paul in his contemporary context have shown that his person is more complex than would be assumed based only on the analysis of Judaism. This leads to an effort to develop the ability to assess not only biblical figures, but also persons from church history and the present, in such a way as to take into account their broader complexity of their personality and their activities. Also, in the mirror of Paul's research, the processes of creation, origin and transformation of the human personality can be well observed, in which there may also be a transformation of religious identity, or part of it.

OCA18.1 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The results of the research showed in the area of correct understanding of the Apostle Paul in his contemporary context that his person is more complex than would be assumed only on the basis of an analysis of Judaism. This leads to an effort to develop the ability to judge not only biblical figures, but also persons from church history and the present, so as to take into account their broader complexity of their personalities and their scope. Also in the mirror of Paul's research, the processes of creation and transformation of the human personality can be well observed, in which a religious identity, or a part of it, can also change.

OCA19.1 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

Until now, the emphasis in theological teaching - also at the ELTF CU - has come to the fore of the Apostle Paul as a theologian, who, in fact, remained a Jew even in his Christian orientation (especially in his theological thinking). The study also tries to point out Paul's Hellenistic background and his theological connections with the churches, which were created especially in the Hellenistic world. Many examples from authentic sources cited by the author confirm this fact. Therefore, in the educational process of Paul's research, it is thus possible to see the person and theology of this great apostle more comprehensively at the level of the ELTF CU.

OCA15.2 - Annotation of the output with contextual information concerning the description of creative process and the content of the research/artistic/other activity, etc.

The author aims to reconcile the contrasts and find a balance between theology and religious studies, which has so far been seen on the side of both these disciplines. Instead of "mutual hostility", he tries to highlight their benefits for science as well as for their own enrichment.

OCA16.2 - Annotation of the output in English

The author tries to reconcile the contradictions and find a balance between theology and religious studies, which have so far been seen on the side of both these fields. Instead of mutual "hostility", he tries to point out their contributions to science. Exploring the issue of the relationship between theology and religious studies leads us to serious reflection on the problem of the origin, development and current state of coexistence of Christianity with other religions. What is more, it also leads to an understanding of the diversity of Christianity itself, where various aspects of theology and religious practices of various church groups and minority churches are applied.

OCA18.2 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

Examining the issue of the relationship between theology and religious studies leads us to seriously consider the problem of the origin, development and current state of coexistence of Christianity with other religions. Moreover, it also leads to an understanding of the diversity of Christianity itself, where various aspects of the theology and religious practices of various church groups and minority churches apply. Their misunderstanding usually leads to tension, even hostility and, last but not least, aggression. The study seeks to bring openness, sincerity and a willingness to dialogue on this issue.

OCA19.2 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The output of this study can equally well be applied not only in research, in church-social practice, but also directly in the educational process. There, the context of the phenomenon of the origin, ideologisation and functioning of religion as such can be revealed. Of course, always in the comparison of theology and religions. As rivalry sometimes dominated this space, a certain superiority or authoritarianism was also transferred to the teaching process. The study tries to free the educational process from such "cramps" and leads to serious research and educational process.

The output of this study is based on the lifelong work of the New Testament Theologian and Rector of the University of Zurich, Professor Hans Weder. The study reflects on his hermeneutics, especially on his efforts to point out the importance of language and semantics in the creation of theology and proclamation. The study confirms its results and at the same time points to the double phenomenon of how the apostolic church sought to create the gospel and at the same time, as the gospel, shaped the theological thinking of the church in its earliest period.

OCA16.3 - Annotation of the output in English

The author of the study points to the reciprocity between the authority of Scripture and its place in the secular world. He does so on the basis of research works written so far by Hans Weder, Professor of Theology and former Rector of the University of Zurich.

Based on the research of Professor Hans Weder, the study seeks to highlight the importance of correct phraseology and theological language, which is created and applied in the church, in interreligious dialogue and in society, where the church has its place and task to correctly proclaim the gospel and thus faithfully interpret the character and values of the gospel. The study should and can help to a large extent in university practice and in the educational process, both in creating communication between individual disciplines, where language and phraseological accessibility play an important role.

OCA18.3 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

Based on the research of Professor Hans Weder, the study seeks to highlight the importance of correct phraseology and theological language, which is formed and applied in the church, interfaith dialogue and society, where the church has its place and role to proclaim the gospel and thus credibly interpret the character and values of the gospel. It is one of the most important tasks of the church in the mission and in its pastoral practice, where the message of the gospel is to be clear, credible and creative (spiritually and mentally inspiring).

OCA19.3 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The study can help to a large extent in university practice and in the educational process, both in the creation of communication between the various disciplines, where language and phraseological accessibility play an important role. At the same time, the study can also have an impact on how the audience, the target group to which the values of the Gospel are shared, should be taken into account when creating professional lectures as well as theological works. Here, too, it is a dual nature of the interaction between language and the resulting "work", which should also be comprehensible and at the same time inspiring.

OCA15.4 - Annotation of the output with contextual information concerning the description of creative process and the content of the research/artistic/other activity, etc.

In the book, the author points out how the eschatology of the apostolic church could have been formed. It must have included the Hellenistic environment in which the apostolic mission entered. The most effective method to know the period background of the Greek world in the field of eschatology is the research of ancient tombstones. The author has collected more than 1,000 of them for further research. Their content confirms that the mythical eschatology of the ancient Greeks influenced the eschatology of the apostolic church and vice versa.

OCA16.4 - Annotation of the output in English

The author examines around 1000 Greek tomb inscriptions from the Hellenistic and early Imperial period, which provide information about the Greeks' ideas about the afterlife. A large number of particularly representative inscriptions are printed in the original text and in translation. In this way, the work opens up important sources for New Testament scholars that have been neglected by scholars for decades. After a general overview of the ideas of the future in the inscriptions, the author deals with the 'positive' hopes for the future, in particular with the motifs of deification, exaltation, ascension, heavenly dwelling places, community with the gods, divine nature and also with resurrection, as well as with the contrast between Greek and Christian understandings of hope. Since the time of Hellenism, such positive hopes for the future have become increasingly important. In the New Testament parts, important eschatological texts are examined for possible connections to Hellenistic visions of the future. These are surprisingly numerous and varied, not only in texts that have hitherto been considered classic testimonies of 'Hellenistic' eschatology in the New Testament (e.g. in the Gospel of Luke and 2 Peter), but also in other texts. Here we can see how the New Testament eschatology was received by 'Greeks', what was understandable for Greeks or met with a lack of understanding and how the 'transformation' of early Christian eschatology began in the early church.

OCA18.4 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

With his research results, the author of the monograph tried to point out not only the importance of the original period study of apostolic eschatology, but also provoke a theological and interdisciplinary discussion about the meaning of human life and values, which ultimately have their ultimate meaning in life. It is not only about the thanatological aspects, but also about the creation of epitaphs, which as "cemetery poetry" in the form of tombstones can be inspiring and at the same time characteristic of today's man, regardless of whether he is a Christian or not. This is to lead the church to preach the gospel that offers salvation at funeral sermons and thus inspires the positive formulations of today's tombstones.

OCA19.4 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The study is based on period sources in the Greek ancient world. These are Greek originals written in Homeric Greek, which reach readers in the available European (German) language, in many cases for the first time. The author tried to take into account not only the scientific purpose in which he gains a top position, but also the educational process. There are several efforts: 1. on the one hand to provide relevant and linguistically accessible sources for the research of apostolic eschatology. 2. To reveal the process of formation of apostolic eschatology, where the so-called Greek eschatology. 3. The ELTF CU can thus more easily discuss the understanding of Christian eschatology and its creation under the influence of various contemporary components.

OCA16.5 - Annotation of the output in English

Petr Pokorný (1933-2020) was a long-term professor of the New Testament at the Evangelical Theological Faculty of Charles University in Prague. He has written a number of books and studies in which he directly and indirectly addressed hermeneutic issues important for the correct understanding and reliable interpretation of the Biblical text. With Professor Pokorný we can read a lot of useful and rich from several areas of hermeneutics, such as: language as a coding system, symbol and metaphor, text between tradition and future, reader and text, genre, different methods of interpretation, foreignness and attractiveness of texts, history and revelation, revelation and testimony, etc. Based on this hermeneutical set and other exegetical works, the reviewer tries to point out these modalities and provide a definable picture of Pokorný hermeneutic approaches and procedures.

OCA18.5 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The outcome of this study can have a good impact on socio-economic practice, especially in the field of understanding certain theories and, consequently, the creation of correct communication in both the social and ecclesiastical spheres. It is known that the theory of understanding certain information depends on what is the environment and the preconception that creates this information and consequently receives it. The creation of hermeneutic modalities in the work and work of Professor Peter Pokorný is a hermeneutic of understanding, reconciliation, positive acceptance of people from various social and ecclesiastical spheres, whose correct biblical orientation can group and encourage reconciliation and the creation of positive values of life.

OCA19.5 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

Professor Peter Pokorný's hermeneutic modalities are ways of correctly understanding communication processes also in the ecclesiastical and theological spheres. They create a good starting point for the activation of knowledge and learning processes that make their participants more understanding and adapted to the creation of understanding and common speech. They reveal language as a system of communication codes, reveal the meaning of symbols, explain the value of tradition, the meaning of historicity, and help to create testimony as today's language in a spirit of trust. This contributes to good communication, which is extremely important today in the self-reflection of a given society, but especially in the educational process.
