OCA16.1 - Annotation of the output in English

The essay argues that a dialogue between legal interpretation and biblical hermeneutics is possible. This dialogue can take place in the context of philosophy of language. In the theory of legal interpretation, the application of philosophy of language is described using the example of the theory of interpretation advocated by Andrei Marmor in The Language of Law. In biblical hermeneutics, the example of the debate over the original meaning of the term imago Dei shows that the same form of philosophy of language can be used in biblical hermeneutics within the historical-critical method. The author believes that this type of philosophy of language can form a common basis for exploration and mutual dialogue between legal interpretation and biblical hermeneutics. The aim of the mutual dialogue should be to clarify methodological issues that arise in both fields, for example, with regard to the polysemy of terms used in the text of the United States Constitution and the Bible.

OCA18.1 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The presented scholarly output has a significant interdisciplinary impact on socio-economic practice, particularly in the fields of law, theology, ethics, and the humanities. The article analyses methodological parallels between legal interpretation and biblical hermeneutics using tools of analytical philosophy of language, thereby contributing to a deeper understanding of interpretative processes involved in working with normative and authoritative texts. This approach has practical relevance for legal practice, especially in the interpretation of statutory and constitutional texts, as it highlights the limits of reconstructing original meaning and underscores the necessity of taking context, polysemy, and interpretative conventions into account. The output contributes to the cultivation of legal reasoning by providing theoretical foundations for more transparent and methodologically self-reflective interpretative practices among judges, legal professionals, and lawmakers. At the same time, it has a broader societal impact on public discourse concerning legitimacy of authority, equality, and human dignity, as the analysed concepts (such as imago Dei) extend into discussions on human rights and the ethical foundations of modern democratic societies. The output is also applicable in educational practice, particularly in fostering critical thinking among students of law, theology, and philosophy.

OCA19.1 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The presented scholarly output has a significant impact on the educational process within the accredited field of Lutheran Theology, particularly in the areas of biblical hermeneutics, systematic theology, and theological research methodology. The article introduces a methodologically reflective approach to the interpretation of biblical texts by employing tools from analytical philosophy of language and theories of interpretation developed in legal philosophy. This interdisciplinary framework enables students to gain a deeper understanding of the nature of interpreting authoritative texts, the limits of reconstructing original meaning, and the necessity of distinguishing between the text itself, its historical context, and subsequent interpretative traditions. The output is directly applicable in the teaching of courses focused on biblical exegesis, hermeneutics, and theological methodology, as it provides theoretical instruments for the critical evaluation of interpretative approaches within the history of theology. It supports the development of students' analytical and critical thinking skills, their capacity for methodological self-reflection and argumentation, as well as sensitivity to the plurality of legitimate interpretations of biblical texts. The associated research activities further contribute to strengthening the integration of research and teaching, thereby enhancing the quality, relevance, and academic rigor of theological education.

OCA16.2 - Annotation of the output in English

The author analyzes the difference between a concept and its different conceptions by using the example of the difference between the concept and conceptions of justice in analytic philosophy in the context of constitutional interpretation. The difference between the concept and distinct conceptions of the concept appears within a section of constitutional interpretation theory illustrating the change in the meaning of moral terms that denote constitutional rights and liberties, principles and values. The author argues that the distinction between a concept and its distinct conceptions may generate more controversy than it resolves in constitutional interpretation theory and should therefore be rejected. This distinction, however, points to one significant linguistic phenomenon that clearly deserves attention, and that is polysemy.

OCA18.2 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The presented scholarly output has a significant impact on socio-economic practice, particularly in the areas of legal culture, public discourse on justice, and the methodological foundations of legal interpretation. The text critically analyzes the distinction between the concept and conceptions of justice in analytic philosophy of law and highlights its limitations when applied in legal and constitutional interpretation. In doing so, it contributes to greater precision in the ways normative and evaluative concepts are employed in legal practice. The output has practical relevance for legal professionals, judges, lawmakers, and experts involved in public policy, as it draws attention to the risks associated with the methodologically unclear use of abstract concepts such as justice, legitimacy, and equality. The proposed analytical approach, grounded in the distinction between semantic and pragmatic aspects of meaning, supports more transparent, rational, and argumentatively accountable decision-making in legal and public contexts. At the same time, the output has a broader societal impact by cultivating public discourse on justice and normativity in democratic societies and by contributing to a better understanding of value conflicts that arise in areas such as human rights, social policy, and constitutional law.

OCA19.2 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The presented scholarly output has a substantial impact on the educational process within the accredited field of Lutheran Theology, particularly in the areas of philosophical foundations of theology, theological ethics, hermeneutics, and interdisciplinary dialogue between theology and legal philosophy. The text systematically analyzes the distinction between a concept and its conceptions of justice in analytic philosophy of law and critically examines its application in theories of legal and constitutional interpretation. From an educational perspective, the output develops students' abilities in precise conceptual analysis, in distinguishing between semantic and pragmatic dimensions of meaning, and in critically evaluating normative arguments. It contributes to a deeper understanding of moral and evaluative concepts that are also central to theological discourse, such as justice, legitimacy, authority, and normativity. The text is applicable in courses in systematic theology, Christian ethics, philosophy of religion, and theological research methodology. It enhances analytical thinking, argumentative competence, and students' capacity to reflect on the limits of interpretative frameworks, thereby contributing to the academic rigor and interdisciplinary openness of theological education.

OCA16.3 - Annotation of the output in English

The article is a continuation of the author's contribution Concept vs. Conception of Justice in Analytic Philosophy of Law (Filozofia 2022/4). It focuses on explaining polysemy as a kind of linguistic indeterminacy that constitutes one of the main reasons why courts come to interpret legal texts. The study discusses polysemy from the perspective of the theory of language used by A Marmor in his theory of interpretation. The author shows the limits of semantic analysis in law and the role of normative presuppositions, which influence the final outcome of judicial decision-making not only in terms of content, but are also important for the choice of formal means that are applied in the context of this decision-making.

OCA18.3 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The presented scholarly output has a significant impact on socio-economic practice, particularly in the areas of legal culture, public discourse on justice, and the methodological foundations of normative reasoning. Its critical analysis of the concept–conception distinction draws attention to the risks associated with simplified uses of evaluative concepts in legal, political, and ethical practice. The output is relevant for legal professionals, judges, policymakers, and experts engaged in normative debates, as it promotes more precise and methodologically reflective uses of concepts such as justice, legitimacy, and equality. The proposed analytical approach, grounded in the distinction between semantic and pragmatic aspects of meaning, contributes to more transparent and argumentatively accountable decision-making. The text also has a broader societal impact by cultivating public discourse on justice and value conflicts in pluralistic democratic societies, including debates on human rights, social justice, and the moral foundations of public institutions.

OCA19.3 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The scholarly output has a substantial impact on the educational process in the accredited field of Lutheran Theology, particularly in the areas of philosophical foundations of theology, theological ethics, and hermeneutics. The text develops students' abilities in precise conceptual analysis, critical evaluation of normative arguments, and reflection on the linguistic and methodological presuppositions of value judgments. The output is applicable in courses in systematic theology, Christian ethics, philosophy of religion, and theological research methodology. It fosters a deeper understanding of moral concepts such as justice and their role in both theological and societal discourse. The associated research activities strengthen the integration of research and teaching and support the development of students' analytical and critical thinking skills. In this way, the output enhances the academic quality of theological education and reinforces its interdisciplinary orientation.

OCA16.4 - Annotation of the output in English

The author argues that the distinction between semantic and pragmatic aspects of the language in the statutory instruments is critical to the theory of juristic interpretation. He tries to define the nature of the legal norm, expressed or communicated by the lawgiver by enacting the particular law. Two sorts of pragmatic processes as articulated by M. Zouhar in his book Meaning in context should be taken into account in interpreting the latter: the semantically relevant processes serving the elimination of semantic ambiguities and pragmatic processes participating in making law complete. The aim of the paper is to support the thesis that the elimination of semantic ambiguities means to determine the second layer of the meaning, i.e. the legal norm expressed by the normative utterance in the context of its use by the legislative body. By contrast, making law complete is based on inferring the third layer of meaning, i.e. an implicated legal norm.

OCA18.4 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The presented scholarly output has a significant impact on socio-economic practice, particularly in the areas of legal interpretation, legislative drafting, and the functioning of public institutions. Its analysis of semantic and pragmatic aspects of legal language contributes to a better understanding of sources of interpretative uncertainty that directly affect legal certainty and the predictability of decision-making. The output is practically relevant for judges, legal professionals, lawmakers, and public administration experts, as it emphasizes the importance of carefully distinguishing between the linguistic meaning of legal norms and meaning derived from the context of their application. The proposed analytical approach supports more transparent, methodologically reflective, and argumentatively accountable decision-making in legal practice. The text also has a broader societal impact by contributing to the cultivation of public discourse on law, justice, and normativity and by enhancing understanding of the role of language in shaping and applying social rules.

OCA19.4 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The scholarly output has a substantial impact on the educational process in the accredited field of Lutheran Theology, particularly in the areas of hermeneutics, philosophical foundations of theology, and theological research methodology. The text provides students with a systematic methodological framework for analyzing meaning, context, and interpretation in normative and authoritative texts. The output is applicable in courses in biblical hermeneutics, systematic theology, Christian ethics, and philosophy of religion. It fosters the development of analytical thinking, conceptual precision, and critical reflection on interpretative strategies and their theoretical presuppositions. The associated research activities strengthen the integration of research and teaching and support students' deeper understanding of linguistic aspects of theological and normative discourse. In this way, the output contributes to enhancing the academic quality of theological education and its interdisciplinary orientation.

OCA16.5 - Annotation of the output in English

This essay deals with the relationship between philosophy of law and philosophy of language. The author closely follows the discussion concerning the determination of the content of the law which has been remarked by current semantics and pragmatics in philosophy of language. According to a view that has considerable currency at present, philosophy of language and linguistics have a direct bearing on the content of the law. The general outlook of this view – the communicative-content theory of law (the communication theory) can be captured in the following way. Legal texts are linguistic texts, so the meaning or content of a legal text is an instance of linguistic meaning generally. It therefore stands to reason that, in order to understand the meaning of an authoritative legal text or utterance, such as a statute or regulation, we should look to our best theories about language and communication.

OCA18.5 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The presented scholarly output has a significant impact on socio-economic practice, particularly in the areas of normative text interpretation, public communication, and the cultivation of professional discourse. Its analysis of the relationship between semantics and pragmatics contributes to a better understanding of the mechanisms through which interpretative disputes arise in law, politics, and ethics. The output is practically relevant for legal professionals, judges, public policy experts, and authors of normative documents, as it highlights the importance of distinguishing between literal meaning and meaning derived from context of use. In doing so, it supports more transparent, argumentatively precise, and methodologically reflective decision-making in legal and public contexts. The text also has a broader societal impact by contributing to the cultivation of public discourse, reducing misunderstandings in value-laden debates, and enhancing understanding of the role of language in shaping social norms and institutions.

OCA19.5 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The scholarly output has a substantial impact on the educational process in the accredited field of Lutheran Theology, particularly in the areas of philosophical foundations of theology, hermeneutics, and theological research methodology. The text provides students with systematic tools for understanding meaning, context, and interpretation, which are essential for working with biblical and theological texts. The output is applicable in courses focused on biblical hermeneutics, systematic theology, philosophy of religion, and theological methodology. It supports the development of analytical thinking, conceptual precision, and critical reflection on interpretative presuppositions. The associated research activities strengthen the integration of research and teaching and contribute to the development of students' methodological self-reflection. In this way, the output enhances the academic quality of theological education and supports its interdisciplinary character.
